The bill passed unanimously in the U.S. Senate in March and now heads to President Biden to be signed into law.

"Designation as a National Estuary Program is a generational investment in the restoration and conservation of our estuaries and watersheds. Children growing up in Northwest Florida today enjoy much of the same quality of life: their parents and grandparents grew up with access to fishing, swimming and exploring our area's beautiful natural resources," Pensacola and Perdido Bays Estuary Program Executive Director Matt Vosner said in the release, noting this designation allows the program to build on existing efforts to support this way of life "for generations to come."

U.S. Sens. Marco Rubio (R-FL) and Rick Scott (R-FL) introduced the legislation to federally designate the PPBEP to leverage federal, state and local government funding to address water quality and resource challenges in Pensacola and Perdido Bays.

Rubio said in a press release that the EPA's National Estuary Program has a successful track record of cooperative federalism across the nation, including with the four existing Florida programs.

Enrolling the PPBEP into this program will provide support for restoration, conservation and monitoring efforts in Pensacola and Perdido Bays while enhancing economic activity in the Florida Panhandle, he said.

EPA's National Estuary Program was established by Congress in 1987 to support non-regulatory, science-based and locally driven programs across the U.S. to address resource management challenges. The PPBEP will be the first new National Estuary Program added to the existing 28 programs in over 30 years.

"This is an overdue recognition of the economic and environmental importance of Pensacola and Perdido Bays to Northwest Florida and our nation," Florida Chief Resilience Officer Wes Brooks said. "The National Estuary Program designation will supplement current local and state investments that are already generating regional water quality improvements and enhancing the resilience of surrounding local communities."

The health and resilience of Pensacola and Perdido Bays are critical to the regional economy. Through the National Estuary Program, local communities are empowered to identify natural resource challenges and implement solutions through science-based, community-driven actions. The designation ensures a commitment to improving water quality and enhancing community resilience in Northwest Florida and southern Alabama through strategic partnerships and investments.

Since creation in 2018, PPBEP and its partners have secured over $30 million to implement priority restoration, resilience and conservation projects in the Pensacola and Perdido Bay watersheds. This action centers funding and policy decisions made today support the long-term sustainability of the region's natural resources and economy.

Many local and national partners have worked for years to secure National Estuary Program designation, recognizing working at the watershed-scale through partnerships is a far more effective and efficient approach to improving water quality, restoring habitat and supporting community resilience.

"We welcome the increased prioritization of the Pensacola and Perdido watersheds. The watersheds connect Alabama and Florida's lands and waters, and the human and natural species that depend on them. With the passage of S.56, we celebrate and look forward to bigger and better partnerships in the future." The Nature Conservancy in Alabama Executive Director Mitch Reid said.

Coastal Arts Center of Orange Beach celebrates annual Light up the Arts

BY RUTH MAYO

Reporter

ORANGE BEACH — The Coastal Arts Center of Orange Beach celebrated its annual Light up the Arts event, which showcased demonstrations of hot glass and pottery creations from The Hot Shop and the Clay Studio, on Dec. 12.

The Hot Shop is the first stop for those walking up to the Coastal Arts Center, and a consistent crowd was held for most of the event. Attendees seemed to find this station the most attractive with the furnace, which was being used to create a glass ornament, warming the room on a cold night.

The Hot Shop team busily worked in a fenced off area in front of a live audience as they explained the process of creating the glass creations that were on display for purchase.

"No, we do not get burned very often," a sign in The Hot Shop read. "The most common way to get burned is by grabbing the wrong end of a hot pipe or tool, so we are very cautious when handling equipment."

The next stop toward the gallery was the Clay Studio where Maya Blume-Cantrell was seated at a pottery wheel working on a project. She explained why there were so many options for pottery glaze displayed on the wall behind her.

"It's not like red and yellow make orange," Blume-Cantrell said. "The color you end up with depends on which color you put on the clay first."

While The Hot Shop could hold a bigger audience, Blume-Cantrell maintained a steady flow of viewers in the cozy studio as she worked at the wheel. She told attendees how her pottery could be found in the Center's gallery to be purchased as Christmas presents.

The next, and final, stop on the Light up the Arts trail is the gallery itself where live music was being performed by saxophonist Rod Pittman as guests could dine on snacks and enjoy the wine bar provided by Friends of the Arts, a nonprofit dedicated to supporting Gulf Coast art.

A raffle was also held inside the center surrounded by the many products on display for purchase from The Hot Shop, the Clay Studio and other local painters and artists. The items available for purchase were recommended as "gorgeous" Christmas gifts.

The Orange Beach Coastal Arts Center is located at 26322 Canal Road. According to the Center's website, admission to the gallery is free, but classes have fees starting at $85, and the art itself varies in price.

"It's not like red and yellow make orange," Maya Blume-Cantrell explained about the many glaze options behind her, "the color you end up with depends on which color you put on the clay first."
