to just after them."

The tiny turtles made their way up to the condo entrances and sidewalks and scooted under raised walkways, some as far as 200 yards from the nest. The group tried their best not to touch the animals but instead scooped them into buckets and pointed them back toward the water.

Johnson said white lights from condos and other buildings have long been a problem for hatchlings erupting from sea turtle nests. The lights disorient the hatchlings, causing them to head toward busy streets instead of the ocean.

Volunteers closely monitor the nests and look for signs that the hatchlings are on the move, such as the sand shifting and dropping near the top of the nest. There was no indication that this nest was ready to erupt.

Johnson said the late-night hatching was a complete surprise.

"They were being sneaky and decided to surprise us," she said. "It's not the first nest surprise we've had. Nature is going to do what nature wants whether we're prepared for it or not."

Baker and his family visit the Gulf Coast every other year. He said he doubts they will ever have this unique experience again. By the end of the evening the group helped to corral 58 turtles. Volunteers found more turtles still in the nest several days later.

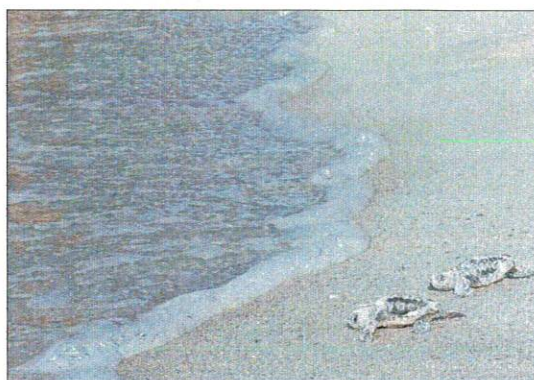

"It's pretty cool. I was always taught to do the right thing and just help out if I can. Now when we talk about our vacation we can say, it's kind of funny. We saved a bunch of baby sea turtles," he said. "It's a once in a lifetime deal."

malicious," she said. "They wanted to get to something, and we don't know why."

Regardless of the motive, federal law prohibits feeding, touching or disturbing sea turtles in any way. Evening shining a flashlight on a sea turtle is considered illegal. Sea turtles are protected under the Federal Endangered Species Act of 1973. Federal penalties include jail time and fines up to $15,000 for each offense.

In Alabama, 60 nests have been found this season across the state's beaches, including 37 in Baldwin County.

Johnson said once a sea turtle lays her eggs and leaves the nest the tiny growing turtles are delicate. During that incubation period under the sand, any adjustment in temperature or jostling of the sand above can destroy the creatures. She said a sea turtle egg removed from the sand will likely not hatch.
